

New York, May 24, 2013 — The Association of Art Museum Directors released this statement today regarding the possible sale of the collection of the Detroit Institute of Arts to provide funds for the City of Detroit.

A museum's collection is held in public trust for current and future generations. This is a bedrock principle of the Association of Art Museum Directors and of the museum field as a whole. Art collections are vitally important cultural and educational resources that should never be treated as disposable assets to be liquidated, even in times of economic distress. Those involved in the discussion of the financial challenges that Detroit faces today must make thoughtful decisions that will serve to strengthen the city in the future. Selling the collection of the Detroit Institute of Arts would undermine this goal. The Association of Art Museum Directors strongly encourages the Detroit Emergency Manager and everyone involved in the process of addressing the city's fiscal issues to preserve this irreplaceable collection to ensure that it will remain in place as a cornerstone for the city's resurgence.

Statement from the American Alliance of Museums on the prospect of the Detroit Institute of Arts being ordered to sell its collection to pay down the city's debt.

The sale of works from the Detroit Institute of Arts' outstanding collection in order to pay down the city's debt would contradict the standards and ethics of the museum field. Museums of all types hold their collections in the public trust, and the Detroit Institute of Arts' collection has been serving the people of Michigan for more than a century. Selling any part of the collection would also be a stark violation of the unspoken, yet enduring, pact between the state and the residents of Detroit – past, present and future. Further, the Institute will be critical to the city's recovery, helping to lure businesses, investments and visitors, while enhancing the overall quality of life in Detroit. A shortsighted sale of the collection will have long-term negative impacts on the city, the region and the state. Voters in Detroit and its surrounding communities have already expressed their unqualified support for this prestigious community institution. The state's leaders should do the same.

The DIA has been a beacon of culture for over a century. The museum includes more than 100 galleries, a 1,150-seat auditorium, a 380-seat lecture/recital hall, an art reference library, and a state-of-the-art conservation services laboratory. In addition to outstanding American, European, Modern and Contemporary, and Graphic art, the museum holds significant works of African, Asian, Native American, Oceanic, Islamic, and Ancient art. The DIA holds its collection in trust for the public and to fulfill its mission of public service to the people of Detroit and the state of Michigan.

The DIA's education philosophy is based on the principle that art is for everyone. The map below demonstrates that the DIA serves organizations across the geographic and economic spectrum of the area, with 48 percent in the two lowest of the five income ranges shown.
